QUESTIONS PRESENTED FOR REVIEW

1. Whether, under this Court's holding in Hustler Magazine, Inc. v. Falwell, 485 U.S. 46 (1988), states may constitutionally impose tort liability for the pure expression of opinion utterly devoid of false factual statements made in the course of an election campaign for the presidency of an 8,700-member statewide public employees' union local, where the expression was made as a political satire by a supporter of one candidate in the course of the election, was expressly designed to ridicule the political views and candidacy of an opposing candidate, and was narrowly circulated to a few of Petitioner's friends amongst the union electorate?

2. Whether, under this Court's holding in Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 342 (1974), a candidate who has voluntarily chosen to run for the presidency of an 8,700-member statewide public employees' union local may constitutionally be deemed not to be a public figure for the purposes of an expression of opinion directed against her, where that expression was made as a political satire by a supporter of an opposing candidate in the course of the election campaign, was expressly designed to ridicule the political views and candidacy of an opposing candidate, and was narrowly circulated to members amongst the union electorate?

3. Whether the First Amendment, as applied to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment, ever permits states to impose tort liability for the pure expression of opinion utterly devoid of false factual statements?

4. Whether states may constitutionally impose tort liability for the infliction of emotional distress based on judicial determinations of fact imbued with the kind of viewpoint discrimination condemned by this Court as unconstitutional in American Booksellers Ass'n v. Hudnut, 475 U.S. 1001 (1986), aff'g, 771 F.2d 323 (7th Cir. 1985), and R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, Minn., 112 S. Ct. 2538 (1992)?

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE WRIT 14

The decision below, in ruling that statewide union elections are no more "public controvers[ies]" than elections for country clubs or condo associations, and that a prominent union political activist running for president of a statewide 8,700-member public employees' union was not a limited purpose public figure, despite the election context in which the expression of opinion was published, violates fundamental principles set forth in Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323 (1973), constitutes an end run around Hustler Magazine v. Falwell, 485 U.S. 46 (1988), highlights a conflict amongst federal circuit courts and state appellate courts, and has serious implications for the free speech rights of American citizens in union elections and in the workplace.

PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS

Petitioner David Heller, an individual, respectfully prays that a writ of certiorari issue to review the judgment and opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, entered on June 13, 1995.

OPINIONS BELOW

The decision of the Supreme Judicial Court for the Commonweath of Massachusetts is reproduced below at A.2.[1] The Memorandum and Order of the Suffolk Superior Court, per Flannery, J., is reproduced below at A.47.

JURISDICTION OF THIS COURT

This Court has jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1257(1988) to review the judgment of the Supreme Judicial Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, entered on June 13, 1995.

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS

U.S. Const. amend. I provides, in pertinent part: "Congress shall make no law ... abridging the freedom of speech or of the press ...."

U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1 provides, in pertinent part: "... nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty or property, without due process of law ...."

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

At the time of the incident, respondent-plaintiff Sylvia Smith Bowman, then 60 years old, was a supervisor in the Worcester office of the Department of Public Welfare ("DPW"). In her twenty years with DPW, Bowman had long been a "prominent" and "extremely active" member of Local 509 of the Service Employees International Union ("union"), holding numerous voluntary political positions in the union.

In 1987, Bowman went on leave to run for president of the 8,700-member statewide union local against the incumbent. Bowman had run against the incumbent several years earlier and had lost.

At the time of the incident, the petitioner-defendant David Heller was a non-supervisory employee working in the same office as Bowman. Heller, too, had been "very involved" in union affairs, having been an active and "avid supporter" of the incumbent president, and an equally avid opponent of Bowman's.

There was evidence that Bowman had used "sexual ... epithet[s], "such as "limp dick," "ass," and "prick" around the office (R.664-665,977-978;1250), and that Bowman had falsely accused Heller and his candidate of being "communists" and had told him that she "hate[d] his politics" (R.976,978-979). There was also evidence that Heller had a reputation in the office for "gender-fairness" and for "get[ting] along with most everyone, female and male" (R.240-241,1046,1249). There was no evidence that Heller ever said anything negative about Bowman as an employee or supervisor.

In response, in October, 1987, as the campaign was heating up, Heller produced two photocollages by cutting out Bowman's name and a photograph of her face taken from her campaign postcards and pasting them atop photographs of a naked and a partially naked female body which he had clipped from a Penthouse or Hustler-style magazine.[2] Heller made five or six photocopies and showed or distributed them to five coworkers in the Worcester office "who[m] [he] thought would appreciate them" (A.50-51; R.235,266-267,1065,1147-48,1340-44). It was clear from the caricatures themselves, and from the testimony of

[2]Although both the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court and the trial judge referred to the magazines from which the photographs were taken as "pornographic," this Court has found that, unlike "obscenity," pornography -- to the extent that it is a legally cognizable term at all -- does not constitute "low value speech" warranting lessened constitutional protections. See American Booksellers Ass'n v. Hudnut, 771 F.2d 323 (7th Cir. 1985), aff'd, 475 U.S. 1001 (1986) (invalidating Indianapolis pornography ordinance). In the instant case, the photocopies were plainly not "obscene" under Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973), nor was that issue ever litigated by the plaintiff.

several witnesses, including Bowman, that the bodies depicted in the caricatures were not, and could not have been, viewed as, nor meant by Heller to be viewed as, Bowman's real body (see R.277-278,392-393,1074). The bodies depicted were those of young, thin women, while Bowman herself was a sexagenarian described by one witness as "obese" (R.367).

Heller testified that although "it was not his intent to sway votes or to induce people not to vote for [Bowman], "it was his intent "to poke fun at [her] campaign, just to make a political satire" and that "the picture looked so absurd that it kind of reflected the absurdity of some of her views and statements" (R.1074). As the Supreme Judicial Court correctly observed, Heller made no further photocopies and did not intend that Bowman would see the photocopies (A.8-9).

It was undisputed that "sexual jokes" and "dirty pictures" were "pass[ed] through the office all the time" (R.50-51;R. 235,266-267,1053) and that Heller himself had previously prepared and distributed a number of satirical pictures.

The plaintiff first learned of the existence of the sexual caricatures and of their distribution throughout the office while she was campaigning and responded by "ma[king] light" of them (R.348,397-398). After the campaign was over, Bowman had her campaign manager show her the photocopies, which, she testified, "shocked" her, made her feel "degraded, publicly humiliated, and vulnerable," and, according to the plaintiff's experts, caused her to suffer Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder (A.9-10).[3]

This lawsuit was filed in 1990 by Bowman in Suffolk County Superior Court, charging Heller, two supervisory employees, and the Commissioner of DPW, with intentional and reckless infliction of emotional distress, defamation, and with violating the Massachusetts Civil Rights

[3]Before filing the instant lawsuit, Bowman filed complaints with DPW administrators, with the union, and with the Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination. Heller was found by DPW to have "sexually harassed" Bowman, and was suspended for five days without pay. Heller was also reprimanded by the union for conduct unbecoming a union member, and, as a result of that reprimand, made a public written apology to Bowman and the union and signed a Memorandum of Understanding.

Act ("Civil Rights Act"), G.L. c.12, §11I, by having deprived Bowman of her right to run for union office.[4] On the eve of the first trial date, almost two years after the filing of the lawsuit, Bowman moved to amend her original complaint by adding an allegation that Heller had violated Bowman's rights under the Civil Rights Act by depriving her of her right to be free from sexual harassment.

After a jury-waived trial, the trial court found that "Bowman became a public figure with respect to the Union election

[4]Before trial, a Settlement Agreement was reached with the other defendants to the litigation and the cases against them were dismissed. The defamation count against Heller was subsequently dismissed on the plaintiff's own motion. Heller filed a counterclaim against Bowman for defamation which was subsequently rejected by the judge after trial.

by virtue of her candidacy," upheld Bowman's claims for tortious infliction of emotional distress, sexual harassment, and violation of Bowman's civil right to run for union office, on the ground that the photocopies amounted to "nothing more than a reduction of Bowman to a sexual object and an attack on her as a woman, rather than as a political candidate" (A.67-68, 69), and, as a result, awarded Bowman $35,000 in damages.[5]

[5]The trial judge's ruling was also premised on his erroneous conclusion that because the photocopies failed to convey a particularized message expressing an "articulable political statement," and because the "photocopies were nothing more than a reduction of Bowman to a sexual object and an attack on her as a woman," they were not sufficiently "expressive" to warrant constitutional protection (A.23,69). This proposition, however, has since been decisively rejected by this Court in Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston, __ U.S. __, 1995 WL 360192 (1995), where this Court unanimously ruled that "a narrow, succinctly articulable message

Heller filed a timely notice of appeal initiating the appellate process before the Massachusetts Appeals Court. The case, however, was taken by the Supreme Judicial Court, sua sponte, and docketed for oral argument by all seven justices of the Court. In it decision of June 13, 1995, which is being appealed herein, the Supreme Judicial Court vacated the trial court's findings that Heller had sexually harassed Bowman and violated her civil right to run for union office on adequate and is not a condition of constitutional protection, which if confined to expressions conveying a 'particularized message,'... would never reach the unquestionably shielded painting of Jackson Pollock, music of Arnold Schönberg, or Jabberwocky verse of Lewis Carroll." As in Hurley, Judge J. Harold Flannery in the instant case adopted an overly expansive reading of state civil rights statutes in order to trump precious First Amendment protections on behalf of politically correct causes.

independent state statutory grounds,[6] but reversed the trial court's finding that Bowman was a "a public figure with respect to the Union election by virtue of her candidacy," ruling that the caricatures were not constitutionally protected and that Heller was liable to Bowman for infliction of emotional distress notwithstanding the plain dictates of this Court's holdings in Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323 (1973), and Hustler Magazine v. Falwell, 485 U.S. 46 (1988).

[6]Although the trial court's opinion as well as the briefs of the parties below were almost exclusively focused on the plaintiff's novel claims under the hostile workplace sexual harassment doctrine, the Supreme Judicial Court managed to dispense with this issue in a summary three-sentence footnote, ruling that "[t]he distribution of the two photocopies did not constitute a threat, intimidation, or coercion as defined by the M[assachusetts] C[ivil] R[ights] A[ct]" (A.6 n.4).

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE WRIT

THE DECISION BELOW, IN RULING THAT UNION ELECTIONS ARE NO MORE "PUBLIC CONTROVERS[IES]" THAN ELECTIONS FOR SOCIAL CLUBS OR CONDO ASSOCIATIONS, AND THAT A PROMINENT UNION POLITICAL ACTIVIST RUNNING FOR PRESIDENT OF A STATEWIDE 8,700-MEMBER PUBLIC EMPLOYEES' UNION WAS NOT A LIMITED PURPOSE PUBLIC FIGURE, DESPITE THE ELECTION CONTEXT IN WHICH THE EXPRESSION OF OPINION WAS PUBLISHED, VIOLATES FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES SET FORTH IN GERTZ V. ROBERT WELCH, INC., 418 U.S. 323 (1973), CONSTITUTES AN END RUN AROUND HUSTLER MAGAZINE V. FALWELL, 485 U.S. 46 (1988), HIGHLIGHTS A CONFLICT AMONGST FEDERAL CIRCUIT COURTS AND STATE APPELLATE COURTS, AND HAS SERIOUS IMPLICATIONS FOR THE FREE SPEECH RIGHTS OF AMERICAN CITIZENS IN UNION ELECTIONS AND IN THE WORKPLACE.

The ruling of the Supreme Judicial Court that respondent-Bowman was not a limited purpose public figure was based on its erroneous conclusions -- reached as a matter of law -- that the results of a union election campaign for the presidency of an 8,700-member union "would [not] be felt by persons who were not participants in the union election contest" and that such an election campaign "ha[s] no more public controversy than the usual election of a president of a social club or an election to the governing board of an educational institution, to the directorship of a corporation, or to the governing body of a condominium association" (A.19) (citation to Georgia Appeals Court decision omitted).

This ruling starkly conflicts with principles first articulated by this Court in Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., supra, 418 U.S. 323, and elaborated by a substantial body of federal First Amendment jurisprudence.[7] Under the standard set forth in Gertz and subsequent cases, an individual will be deemed a limited purpose public figure if a "public controversy" exists, the plaintiff "played a sufficiently central role in the controversy," and the statements directed against that individual were "germane to the plaintiff's participation in the controversy." See Waldbaum v. Fairchild Publications, Inc., 627 F.2d 1287, 1296-1298 (D.C.Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 898 (1980).

[7]The determination as to whether or not the plaintiff is a limited public figure is plainly a question of federal law, see Wolston v. Readers Digest Ass'n, 443 U.S. 157, 165-169 (1979), and is thus subject to review by this Court based upon "an independent examination of the whole record." See New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 285 (1964).

Under this test, "a union election," as the dissenting opinion by Justice Nolan makes clear, "is the absolute paradigm of a public controversy" as "the election would have had an effect on each of the 8,700 members of Local 509" (A.30). The vast majority of federal and state courts which have squarely confronted the issue have held that union officers and individuals running for union office are limited purpose public figures, even where the union involved is small and contains only private sector employees, unlike the 8,700-member state and municipal employee union at issue here.[8] Indeed, until

[8] See, e.g., Miller v. Transamerican Press, Inc., 621 F.2d 721, 724 (5th Cir.), same case, 628 F.2d 932 (5th Cir.1980), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 1041 (1981)(high ranking Teamster official was a public figure); Guam Fed'n of Teachers, Local 1581 v. Ysrael, 492 F.2d 438, 439 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 872 (1974) (noting that officers of teachers union were public figures); Henry v. National Ass'n of Air Traffic Specialists, 836 F.Supp. 1204, 1206 n. 3, 1211 n. 6 (D.Md.1993), aff'd without opinion, 34 F.3d 1066 (4th Cir.1994) (elected union leaders of 1,700-member union were public figures). See also Batson v. Shiflett, 325 Md. 684, 722, 728, 602 A.2d 1191 (1992) (president of small town union local was a public figure); Miles v. Perry, 11 Conn. App. 584, 592 n. 7, 529 A.2d 199 (1987) (noting that union officers generally deemed public figures for purposes of union business); Lins v. Evening News Ass'n, 129 Mich.App. 419, 432, 342 N.W.2d 573 (1983) (union officers are limited purpose public figures); City Firefighters Union, Local 28 v. Duci, 104 Misc.2d 498, 503 n. 7, 428 N.Y.S.2d 772 (1976) (same); Hanlon v. Davis, 76 Md.App. 339, 357, 545 A.2d 72 (1988)(observing that trial court instructed jury that president of "small" government employees union of 450 members was a public figure); Jean v. Dugan, 20 F.3d 255, 262 n.7 (7th Cir. 1994). Moreover, as the dissent further points out, this election campaign might well have commanded an "increased level of public interest" as many members of the union were state workers employed by DPW and paid by state taxpayers (A.30n.2).

because he had "voluntarily thrust himself into the controversy by campaigning for reelection to th[at] position", even though the local had only 1,400 members -- one-sixth the size of the local in the instant case. See Materia v. Huff, 394 Mass. 328, 330-333 (1985).

Moreover, it can hardly be disputed that Bowman "played a sufficiently central role" in the election. Bowman had been, by all accounts, a "very active" and "very prominent" member of the union throughout her career, having occupied over a dozen union political posts, all of which were voluntary, and none of which were prerequisites of her job. Nor is this a case where "publicness" has been thrust upon a private citizen. Bowman chose to run for office.

Although the majority below declined to determine whether the photocopies were "germane to the plaintiff's participation in the union election" (A.16 n.15), it is clear that the photocopies were indeed "germane" to Bowman's controversial candidacy for president. The photocopies were constructed using Bowman's own campaign materials and circulated during the height of the campaign as part of an ongoing, contentious, political, and personal dialogue between Bowman and Heller. Their circulation was narrowly targeted at less than a half-dozen union members, all of whom were part of the union electorate. Moreover, there is no evidence that Heller ever ridiculed Bowman as a worker or supervisor, but only as a candidate.

In this country, for better or for worse, when a candidate throws her hat into the ring, the candidate as well as her ideas are before the voters. Accordingly, ad hominem attacks and personal invective have long been a staple of constitutionally-protected political campaign rhetoric. Even if, as the trial court found, Heller had intended the photocopies to "reduc[e] ... Bowman to a sexual object" and to "attack ... her as a woman" (A.69), he was entitled to do so just as previous candidates and their supporters have urged others to vote against George Washington because he was an "ass" (see Hustler Magazine, supra, 485 U.S. at 54), John F. Kennedy because he was Catholic, Richard Nixon because he was a "a liar and a crook," Ronald Reagan because he was "old and senile," Jesse Jackson because he is an African American, or Bill Clinton because he is a "womanizer" or because his wife is a "dominatrix" (see Addendum attached hereto). To deny this parody the constitutional protection afforded others under Hustler is to elevate political correctness to a constitutional principle.

While Heller stated that he did not intend the photocopies to influence the outcome of the election because he believed that those to whom he distributed them had already made up their minds, he also stated that he did intend them to be "political satire[s]" and wanted to make Bowman look as "absurd" and "ridiculous" as her ideas (A.9;R.50,19,913,1074,1178). The Supreme Judicial Court's single-minded reliance on the former statement not only ignores the entire election context in which the photocopies were distributed, but also overlooks the multitude of purposes routinely served by campaign speech, including criticizing, demoralizing and even insulting the opposition, as well as rallying one's own campaign troops.

Moreover, the Supreme Judicial Court's

bizarre attempt to analogize union elections to elections in social clubs or condo associations fundamentally misunderstands the importance of union democracy to the daily lives of working men and women throughout the country and to the importance of "uninhibited, robust, and wide-open debate" in the labor union context.[9] Social clubs and condo

Austin, 418 U.S. 264, 273 (1974) (hereinafter "Letter Carriers") (also recognizing that "exaggerated rhetoric was commonplace in labor disputes"); Linn v. United Plant Guard Workers, 383 U.S. 53, 63 (1966) (holding that federal labor policy preempts state defamation law in the labor union context and that the "actual malice" standard, which applies to allegedly defamatory statements made in that context, dictates that even "the most repulsive speech enjoys immunity provided it falls short of a deliberate or reckless untruth"). See also Wirtz v. Local Union No. 125, Laborer's Int'l Union of N. Am., 389 U.S. 477, 483 (1968); Wirtz v. associations are not only far smaller, as a rule, than the 8,700-member statewide public employees' union local at issue here, but also, as the dissent correctly points out, are "purely private organizations created to protect the private entertainment or the private property interests of their members" (A.30n.2), which do not raise the kind of issues of public concern raised by elections amongst unions largely comprised of state workers.[10]

This Court's resolution of the issues

[10]Of course, as the dissent points out, even elections in unions comprised solely of private sector employees are frequently highly politicized and of compelling interest to the general public. The public has legitimate and compelling interests in the democratic functioning of all areas of civil society, not simply in areas directly implicating the interests and actions of the state.

raised herein would have the added salutary effect of resolving once and for all which of the "various tests" for applying the Gertz standard are to be followed by both state and federal courts throughout the land, tests which have diverse criteria and which have produced equally diverse outcomes.[11]

however insulting, degrading, or offensive which this Court has long insisted upon -- all in the name of political correctness. In its unanimous decision in the Hustler case, this Court made clear, without dissent, that First Amendment principles, originally developed in the context of defamation cases, bar public figures from recovering for expressions of opinion -- including sexually explicit satires far more offensive than those at issue here -- which do not contain statements of fact which are provably "false." This is because, unlike "false statements of fact" which unduly interfere with the truth-seeking function of the marketplace of ideas and which cannot as easily be repaired by counterspeech, see Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., supra, 418 U.S. at 340, 344 n.9, expressions of personal opinion lie at the core of the freedoms of expression embodied in the First and Fourteenth Amendments. See id. at 339-340 ("[u]nder the First Amendment there is no such thing as a false idea[;] however pernicious an opinion may seem, we depend for its correction not on the conscience of judges and juries but on the competition of other ideas"). See also R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 112 S. Ct. 2538 (1992) ("[w]hen government regulates political speech or 'editorial opinion on matters of public importance[,] ... First Amendment protection is at its zenith'") (citations omitted). Although this Court in Milkovich v. Lorain Journal Co., 497 U.S. 1 (1990), declined to create a wholly separate category of "opinion privilege," the Court made clear that "a statement of opinion relating to matters of public concern which does not contain a provably false factual connotation will receive full constitutional protection," and that only expressions of opinion which imply defamatory assertions of fact which are capable of being proven "false" are constitutionally subject to liability. Id. at 20.

In the instant case, the photocopies were plainly expressive of personal and political opinion, utterly devoid of provably "false" factual statements.[12] The photocopies were clearly composites created by pasting photographs of Bowman's face and name on top of photographs of the bodies of others (see R.1337-38) and could not have "reasonably be[en] understood as describing actual facts about [Bowman] or actual events in which [s]he participated," Hustler Magazine, supra, 485 U.S. at 49 (citation omitted), nor could they, in any meaningful sense, have been proven "false." Because Bowman became a "public figure" by running for union office, and because the [12]The lower court's assertion that "Heller's caricatures did not constitute an 'articulable political statement,'" while the Hustler ad parody "impl[ied] a sexual and moral hypocrisy on the part of Falwell" (A.68), was flatly rejected by this Court in Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston, supra, 1995 WL 360192.

satires were pure expressions of opinion, Bowman should have been required to establish the "actual malice" required by Hustler Magazine.

As the Justices Nolan and Lynch make clear in their well-reasoned dissent, because "the plaintiff became a limited purpose public figure when she voluntarily thrust herself into the election campaign," because "the caricatures ... addressed the plaintiff's campaign for the presidency, despite their horrid content," and because the caricatures were not shown to contain any "false statement[s] of fact" (A.26-27), the plaintiff utterly failed to prove "actual malice" as required by this Court in Hustler (A.20). The only real distinction between this case and Hustler is that this case involves a woman public figure subjected to sexual caricature.

To the extent that the ruling of the state court below was premised upon findings of fact that "establishe[d] an 'approved' view of women [and] of how the sexes may relate to each other," the state court's ruling must be invalidated as improperly based on unconstitutional "viewpoint discrimination," as condemned in American Booksellers Ass'n v. Hudnut, supra, 771 F.2d 323, and R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, Minn., 112 S. Ct. 2538 (1992). See also Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1 (1948).

CONCLUSION

Because the decision below -- by ruling that union elections, particularly of public sector employees, are no more "public controvers[ies]" than elections for social clubs or condo associations, and that a prominent union political activist running for president of a statewide 8,700-member public employees' union was not a limited purpose public figure, despite the election context in which the expression of opinion was published -- violated fundamental principles set forth in Gertz, constituted an end run around Hustler, highlights a conflict amongst federal circuit courts and state appellate courts, and has disturbing implications for the free speech rights of American citizens in union elections and in the workplace, this Court should grant this petition for certiorari.

ABRAMS, Justice. The defendant, appealing from a judgment that was based in part on his intentional or reckless infliction of emotional distress on the plaintiff, seeks refuge in the fact that at the time of his wrongdoing the plaintiff was a candidate for election to the office of president of their union local. From this, the defendant argues that the First Amendment to the United States Constitution protects him from liability in the absence of proof of actual malice. The defendant's claim fails from its inception because the activity on which liability was based was, on the defendant's own admission, not intended to influence the union election. The Supreme Court has distinguished plaintiffs' claims for defamation or intentional infliction of emotional distress on the basis of the plaintiffs' prominence with regard to public controversies relevant to their causes of action. See Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 342, 94 S.Ct. 2997, 3008, 41 L.Ed.2d 789 (1974). Because there was no evidence of a public controversy, the plaintiff was neither a public figure nor a limited purpose public figure.

After the election, the plaintiff sought recovery on four related claims: one count of intentional infliction of emotional distress; one count of reckless infliction of emotional distress;[2] and two claims under the Massachusetts Civil Rights Act (MCRA), G.L. c. 12, § 11I (1992 ed.).[3] After a jury-waived trial, judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff, and damages were awarded in the amount of $35,000. The trial judge ruled that "any one of the plaintiff's claims ... [was] a sufficient basis" for the $35,000 judgment, but refused to award "duplicative" damages. The [2]The elements of a cause of action for reckless infliction of emotional distress are the same as those for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Thus, our discussion of the latter applies equally to the former cause of action.

[3]The plaintiff alleged that the defendant's actions violated her right to run for union office and her right to be free from sexual harassment. General Laws c. 12, § 11I (1992 ed.), provides in relevant part: "Any person whose exercise or enjoyment of rights secured by the constitution or laws of the United States, or of rights secured by the constitution or laws of the commonwealth, has been interfered with, or attempted to be interfered with, as described in [§] 11H, may institute and prosecute in his own name and on his own behalf a civil action for injunctive and other appropriate equitable relief as provided for in said section, including the award of compensatory money damages...."

defendant appeals. We transferred the case to this court on our own motion. We conclude that the judgment based on the tort claim of intentional or reckless infliction of emotional distress should be affirmed.[4]

I. Facts. At the time of the incident which gave rise to this litigation, the plaintiff, Sylvia Smith Bowman, was a sixty year old supervisor in the Worcester office of the Department of Public Welfare (department). She began working as a social worker for the department in 1967, and was a longstanding and active member of Local 509 of the Service Employees International Union (union). In the 1987 union election, the plaintiff challenged

[4]The defendant also claimed that the evidence was insufficient to support the judgment in the plaintiff's favor under the Massachusetts Civil Rights Act. The distribution of the two photocopies did not constitute a threat, intimidation, or coercion as defined by the MCRA. We vacate the judgment to the extent that it is based on any violation of the MCRA.

the incumbent president of the local chapter of the union.

In October, 1987, while the plaintiff was on an approved leave to campaign in the union election, the defendant, David Heller, an employee in the plaintiff's office who supported the incumbent president, created two distinct photocopied representations of the plaintiff by superimposing a photograph of her face and name on two different photographs of women striking lewd or masturbatory poses. The photograph of the plaintiff's face was taken from a campaign card she had distributed to union members. The photographs on which the defendant superimposed the plaintiff's face were taken by the defendant from pornographic magazines. In one of the photographs, the model is nude from the waist down, except for garters, and is posed toward the camera with her legs wide apart as she holds a banana next to her exposed breast. In the other photograph, the model is entirely naked, and appears to be engaged in masturbation. The representations were crafted by the defendant during regular office hours and reproduced on photocopiers owned by the department. The defendant then distributed his handiwork to five coworkers in the Worcester office. Subsequently, the representations were reproduced by employees other than the defendant and distributed to a wider office audience.

The trial judge credited the defendant's claim that, in distributing the caricatures, "it was not his intent to sway votes or to induce people not to vote for [the plaintiff]," and that he sought to make the plaintiff "look ridiculous." The trial judge also credited Heller's statement that he wanted "[t]o make sure they wouldn't be seen by [the plaintiff]," because they were "a private satire among a select group of friends."

When the plaintiff returned to the office from her campaign leave in November, 1987, she learned of the sexually explicit nature of the photocopies and their distribution throughout the office. The defendant made various allegations that the plaintiff harbored a desire for revenge, and that she made various crude references to men in general and the defendant in particular.

The trial judge found that once the plaintiff saw the pictures she was "shocked" and experienced severe stress, crediting her testimony that she felt "degraded, publicly humiliated, and vulnerable upon seeing the photocopies; [and that] she also felt that the matter was too serious for her to remain silent." The judge also credited the testimony of an expert who explained the sequelae associated with posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) and opined that the plaintiff suffered from PTSD and that the trauma of being represented in the workplace in the compromising caricatures created by a coworker was the cause. According to the record, the plaintiff had to undergo, and still is undergoing, psychological therapy for PTSD. The trauma of the event had a negative impact on her ability to function as productively as she had for many years at her job.[5] The judge found that this trauma was unrelated to the plaintiff's loss in the union election.

As a result of her distress about the photocopies, the plaintiff filed formal complaints with department administrators and the union. The department officials determined that the defendant's conduct was sexually harassing, reprimanded the defendant, and explained to the plaintiff that "the production and limited distribution of sexually explicit material by [the defendant] which contained a reproduction of your facial features ... subjected [you] to highly improper and unacceptable behavior which constituted sexual harassment." The union trial board concluded that the defendant's conduct was unbecoming to a union member. The union's determination resulted in a public apology by the defendant to the plaintiff.

Subsequently, the plaintiff filed her tort claims, and amended her complaint to add her statutory claims. The defendant filed counterclaims alleging the plaintiff had defamed him. The trial judge allowed the plaintiff's motion for summary judgment on the defendant's counterclaims. The defendant did not appeal the disposition of his counterclaims. Those claims are not before us.[6]

II. The plaintiff is neither a public figure nor a limited purpose public figure. The trial judge ruled that the plaintiff was a public figure because she voluntarily became

[6]The defendant does not challenge the trial judge's findings of fact or the sufficiency of the evidence on the elements of the torts of intentional and reckless infliction of emotional distress. See Boyle v. Wenk, 378 Mass. 592, 392 N.E.2d 1053 (1979); Agis v. Howard Johnson Co., 371 Mass. 140, 144-145, 355 N.E.2d 315 (1976). The judge found that the defendant's actions in creating and distributing the photocopies at work were extreme and outrageous, e.g., outside all reasonable bounds of civilized society, were aimed intentionally at causing, and actually did cause, the plaintiff severe emotional harm. We review the judge's findings of fact to determine whether they are clearly erroneous. See Powers v. Freetown-Lakeville Regional Sch. Dist. Comm., 392 Mass. 656, 659, 467 N.E.2d 203 (1984); Marlow v. New Bedford, 369 Mass. 501, 508, 340 N.E.2d 494 (1976). See also Mass.R.Civ.P. 52(a), 365 Mass. 816 (1974). Conclusions of law are not set aside by a reviewing court unless inconsistent with applicable law. See Powers, supra; Marlow, supra. We conclude that there is neither error of fact nor a mistake of law in the trial judge's findings and order on these tort claims.

involved in the local union election. See Hustler Magazine, Inc. v. Falwell, 485 U.S. 46, 108 S.Ct. 876, 99 L.Ed.2d 41 (1988). Whether the plaintiff is a public figure is a question of law. See Wolston v. Reader's Digest Ass'n, 443 U.S. 157, 165-169, 99 S.Ct. 2701, 2706-2708, 61 L.Ed.2d 450 (1979); Materia v. Huff, 394 Mass. 328, 331, 475 N.E.2d 1212 (1985). The Supreme Court has said that an individual plaintiff's status is context-dependent and thus determined "by looking to the nature and extent of an individual's participation in the particular controversy giving rise to the [tort liability]." Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 352, 94 S.Ct. 2997, 3013, 41 L.Ed.2d 789 (1974). "Absent clear evidence of general fame or notoriety in the community, and pervasive involvement in the affairs of society, an individual should not be deemed a public personality for all aspects of [her] life." Id. The fame required for an individual to be a public figure for all purposes, as opposed to a limited purpose public figure, is very great; the individual must be a "household name" on a national scale. Tavoulareas v. Piro, 817 F.2d 762, 772 (D.C.Cir.), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 870, 108 S.Ct. 200, 98 L.Ed.2d 151 (1987) (although plaintiff was "highly prominent individual, especially in business circles," he was not a general purpose public figure for "all aspects" of his life where his "celebrity in society at large [did] not approach that of a well-known athlete or entertainer--apparently the archetypes of the general purpose public figure"). The plaintiff clearly is not a general purpose public figure.

The Federal Circuit Courts of Appeal have developed various tests to aid judges in applying the two-prong limited purpose public figure standard set forth in Gertz.[7] See, e.g., Clyburn v. News World Communications, Inc., 903 F.2d 29, 31 (D.C.Cir.1990) (applying test for limited purpose public figure first set forth in Waldbaum v. Fairchild Publications, Inc., 627 F.2d 1287, 1296-1298 (D.C.Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 898, 101 S.Ct. 266, 66 L.Ed.2d 128 (1980): "(1) that there have been a public controversy; (2) that the plaintiff have played a sufficiently central role in the controversy; and (3) that the alleged defamatory statement have been germane to the plaintiff's

[7]Gertz established the two-pronged analysis to determine if an individual is a limited public figure. First, a "public controversy" must exist. Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 345, 94 S.Ct. 2997, 3009-10, 41 L.Ed.2d 789 (1974). Second, "the nature and extent of the individual's participation in the particular controversy" must be ascertained. See Clark v. American Broadcasting Co., Inc., 684 F.2d 1208, 1218 (6th Cir.1982), cert. denied, 460 U.S. 1040, 103 S.Ct. 1433, 75 L.Ed.2d 792 (1983).

participation in the controversy");[8] Silvester v. American Broadcasting Cos., Inc., 839 F.2d 1491, 1493 (11th Cir.1988) (adopting Waldbaum three-part limited purpose public figure test); Lerman v. Flynt Distrib. Co., Inc., 745 F.2d 123, 136-137 (2d Cir.1984), cert. denied, 471 U.S. 1054, 105 S.Ct. 2114, 85 L.Ed.2d 479 (1985) (requiring a defendant to show that the plaintiff has: "(1) successfully invited public attention to his views in an effort to influence others prior to the incident that is the subject of litigation; (2) voluntarily injected himself into a public controversy related to the subject of the litigation; (3) assumed a position of prominence in the public controversy; and (4) maintained regular and continuing access to the media"); Contemporary Mission, Inc. v. New York Times Co., 842 F.2d 612, 617 (2d Cir.), cert. denied sub nom. O'Reilly v. New York Times Co., 488 U.S. 856, 109 S.Ct. 145, 102 L.Ed.2d 117 (1988); Bruno & Stillman, Inc. v. Globe Newspaper Co., 633 F.2d 583, 590 (1st Cir.1980) ("first task" is to determine "the sort of public controversy referred to in Gertz"). Courts must determine if there is a public controversy because of the "profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open, and that it should include vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on government and public officials." New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 270, 84 S.Ct. 710, 721, 11 L.Ed.2d 686 (1964).

Because most cases involve media defendants reporting on controversies of interest to the public, the courts have had little difficulty in recognizing public controversies in most of the limited purpose public figure cases, and thus they have ruled that the plaintiffs had limited purpose public status. Of course, media attention does not alone transform a private controversy into a public one, Time, Inc. v. Firestone, 424 U.S. 448, 96 S.Ct. 958, 47 L.Ed.2d 154 (1976), and the attention that a defendant's alleged wrong itself generates does not create a public controversy necessary for limited purpose public figure status. See Hutchinson v. Proxmire, 443 U.S. 111, 135, 99 S.Ct. 2675, 61 L.Ed.2d 411 (1979) ("Clearly, those charged with defamation cannot, by their own conduct, create their own defense by making the claimant a public figure").

The defendant does not claim that the election contest received any public attention.

There was no basis for concluding the result of the election contest would be felt by persons who were not participants in the union election. The election in this case had no more public controversy than the usual election of a president of a social club or an election to the governing board of an educational institution, to the directorship of a corporation, or to the governing body of a condominium association (see, e.g., Sewell v. Eubanks, 181 Ga.App. 545, 546, 352 S.E.2d 802 [1987]).

The fact that the controversy was a union election does not provide an automatic basis for deciding for First Amendment purposes that there was a public controversy.[9] The defendant makes

[9]The defendant does not argue that there was an issue of public concern in the union election. We have not found any case other than Materia v. Huff, 394 Mass. 328, 475 N.E.2d 1212 (1985), in which the mere fact of involvement in a local union election was sufficient to establish the limited purpose public figure status of an otherwise private individual. See generally Annot., Who is a "Public

United Plant Guard Workers of Am., Local 114, 383 U.S. 53, 65, 86 S.Ct. 657, 664, 15 L.Ed.2d 582 (1966); 29 U.S.C. § 413 (1988). If all candidates for office in a union, particularly a union of State employees, are to be treated automatically as limited purpose public figures, the standard that courts have been following in determining that status will have to be abandoned. In sum, the plaintiff was not a limited purpose public figure because the [10]The defendant phrases his defense to the plaintiff's claim under the "First and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution and in arts. 9, 16, and 19 of the Massachusetts Declaration of Rights." We reject the defendant's argument that art. 9, as interpreted in Batchelder v. Allied Stores Int'l, Inc., 388 Mass. 83, 445 N.E.2d 590 (1983), provides him broader protection than the First Amendment in these circumstances. On the facts before us, we decline to extend the protection of arts. 9, 16, and 19 to the circumstances of this case.

Amendment concern." (Citations omitted.) Dun & Bradstreet, Inc. v. Greenmoss Builders, Inc., 472 U.S. 749, 758-759, 105 S.Ct. 2939, 2944-2945, 86 L.Ed.2d 593 (1985). In Dun & Bradstreet, the Supreme Court followed the standard for determining whether an issue was of public concern set forth in Connick v. Myers, 461 U.S. 138, 147-148, 103 S.Ct. 1684, 1690, 75 L.Ed.2d 708 (1983) ("Whether ... speech addresses a matter of public concern must be determined by the [expression's] content, form, and context ... as revealed by the whole record"), holding that a credit report was not of public concern. In addition, the Court noted that the report was available confidentially to only five subscribers and thus the information was not vital to "the free flow of commercial information." Dun & Bradstreet, supra 472 U.S. at 762, 105 S.Ct. at 2947. Thus, the Court concluded that no "special protection" was required for the credit reports "to ensure that 'debate on public issues [will] be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open.' " Id.[11] The imposition of tort liability in circumstances where the record does not disclose a public controversy is not prohibited.

The defendant argues that the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act, 29 U.S.C. § 411(2), provides the defendant, as a union member, with "extraordinarily broad freedoms." We believe that the defendant mistakenly relies on decisions under the National Labor Relations Act, such as Marshall v. Local Union No. 815, United Textile Workers, 479 F.Supp. 613 (E.D.Tenn.1979); and Rollison v. Hotel, Motel, Restaurant, & Constr. Camp Employees, Local 879, 677 F.2d 741 (9th Cir.1982). The defendant does not argue that the statute is applicable. If the statute is not applicable, "[t]he test for preemption of a tort claim is whether the [S]tate 'confers nonnegotiable [S]tate-law rights on employers or employees independent of any right established by contract, or, instead, whether evaluation of the tort claim is inextricably intertwined with consideration of the terms of the labor contract.' " Young v. Anthony's Fish Grottos, Inc., 830 F.2d 993, 999 (9th Cir.1987), quoting Allis-Chalmers Corp. v. Lueck, 471 U.S. 202, 213, 105 S.Ct. 1904, 1912, 85 L.Ed.2d 206 (1985). On this record, there is no union contract involved. The defendant does not assert that the plaintiff's tort claims are "inextricably intertwined with the terms of the labor contract." Id. The record does not support any such claim.

III. Conclusion. We conclude that the defendant's speech was not entitled to constitutional protection because there was no public controversy. Further, because the defendant did not intend to influence the union election, the imposition of liability for the defendant's speech does not chill constitutional rights of free speech.

Judgment affirmed.

NOLAN, Justice (dissenting, with whom LYNCH, J., joins).

I disagree with the court's holding that the plaintiff was not a limited purpose public figure because the union election was not a public controversy. I conclude that the plaintiff became a limited purpose public figure when she voluntarily thrust herself into the election campaign. I also conclude that the caricatures at issue addressed the plaintiff's campaign for the presidency, despite their horrid content. As a result, I would use the "actual malice" standard of liability in determining whether the plaintiff should recover on her claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress.[1] Hustler Magazine, Inc. v. Falwell, 485 U.S. 46, 56, 108 S.Ct. 876, 882, 99

[1]Under the actual malice standard, the plaintiff must prove that the speech was false and that the speaker either had knowledge of the falsity or had acted with reckless disregard of the truth. See Hustler Magazine, Inc. v. Falwell, 485 U.S. 46, 56, 108 S.Ct. 876, 882, 99 L.Ed.2d 41 (1988).

L.Ed.2d 41 (1988). Thus, because the plaintiff has failed to prove that the caricatures contained a false statement of fact, I dissent.

In reviewing the trial judge's finding of liability on the plaintiff's claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress, we must "make an independent examination of the whole record" in order to insure "that the judgment does not constitute a forbidden intrusion on the field of free expression." New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 285, 84 S.Ct. 710, 729, 11 L.Ed.2d 686 (1964). Having reviewed the entire record, I am compelled to disagree with the court's conclusion that the plaintiff was not a limited purpose public figure. This court decided precisely this issue in Materia v. Huff, 394 Mass. 328, 475 N.E.2d 1212 (1985), where we held that the plaintiff was a limited purpose public figure as a matter of law because he "voluntarily thrust himself into the controversy by campaigning for reelection to the position of secretary-treasurer of Local 526." Id. at 331, 475 N.E.2d 1212. Nevertheless, today the court decides that an election campaign for the presidency of a union local is not a public controversy. In support of this decision the court states that "[t]here was no basis for concluding [that] the result of the election contest would be felt by persons who were not participants in the union election." Ante at 374. The court continues in this vein stating that "[t]he election in this case had no more public controversy than the usual election of a president of a social club or an election to the governing board of an educational institution, to the directorship of a corporation, or to the governing body of a condominium association."

These conclusions are in reference to the first prong of the three part test for determining whether an individual is a limited purpose public figure, set forth in Waldbaum v. Fairchild Publications, Inc., 627 F.2d 1287, 1297-1298 (D.C.Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 898, 101 S.Ct. 266, 66 L.Ed.2d 128 (1980). The first prong, which addresses the issue whether there is a public controversy, requires the reviewing court to "ask whether a reasonable person would have expected persons beyond the immediate participants in the dispute to feel the impact of its resolution. If the issue was being debated publicly and if it had foreseeable and substantial ramifications for non-participants, it was a public controversy." (Footnote omitted.) Id. at 1297.

In my opinion, an election is the absolute paradigm of a public controversy. The "immediate participants" in this union election campaign, the candidates, would not have been the only persons to have felt the impact of the election. Instead, the election would have had an effect on each of the 8700 members of Local 509.[2] In addition, the Supreme Court of the United States has stated repeatedly that the public has an interest in labor unions in general and in union elections in particular. See Wirtz v. Local Union No. 125, Laborers' Int'l Union of N. Am., 389 U.S. 477, 483, 88

[2]I also think that the court has failed to consider the increased level of public interest that is implicated in this case where many members of Local 509 were State workers who were employed by the Department of Welfare. As employees of the State, their salaries were paid with State tax dollars. The court's comparison, therefore, between a union election and an election in a social club or the governing body of a condominium association is particularly ill-conceived in this case. Both a social club and a condominium association are purely private organizations created to protect the private entertainment or the private property interests of their members.

S.Ct. 639, 642, 19 L.Ed.2d 716 (1968) (noting that the public has an interest in labor union elections); Wirtz v. Local 153, Glass Bottle Blowers Ass'n of the U.S. & Can., 389 U.S. 463, 475, 88 S.Ct. 643, 650, 19 L.Ed.2d 705 (1968) (stating that "Congress [has] emphatically asserted a vital public interest in assuring free and democratic union elections"); Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88, 102-103, 60 S.Ct. 736, 744, 84 L.Ed. 1093 (1940) (stating that labor relations are not matters of mere local or private concern). See also National Ass'n of Gov't Employees v. National Fed'n of Fed. Employees, 844 F.2d 216, 220 (5th Cir.1988) (indicating that the labor union election campaigns are a matter of public concern). Based on this authority, I conclude that the election campaign for the presidency of Local 509 was a public controversy.[3] The plaintiff, therefore, became a limited purpose public figure when she voluntarily thrust herself into the election campaign for the presidency of Local 509.[4] See Materia v. Huff, supra at 331,

[3]If, however, the election was not a public controversy in relation to the public at large, it was certainly a public controversy in relation to the members of Local 509. See Materia v. Huff, supra at 331, 475 N.E.2d 1212 (stating that "the plaintiff's status as a public figure is determined in relation to those [union] members, rather than to the community at large"); Walko v. Kean College of New Jersey, 235 N.J.Super. 139, 152, 561 A.2d 680 (1988) (deciding that a college administrator was a public figure within the college community). Indeed, the plaintiff had communicated directly with many of the members of Local 509 while campaigning for the presidency. In 1987, the plaintiff spent a total of forty-five days visiting most of the four hundred union work sites throughout the State. She also mailed thousands of campaign postcards to the homes of members of Local 509. Thus, it is clear that the plaintiff enjoyed broad access to channels of communication in her effort to generate support for her campaign. See Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 345, 94 S.Ct. 2997, 3009-10, 41 L.Ed.2d 789 (1974) (stating that a plaintiff's access to channels of effective communication is an important consideration in determining whether he is a public figure).

[4]Many other courts have concluded that union officers are limited public figures. See Miller v. Transamerican Press, Inc., 621 F.2d 721, 724 (5th Cir.), S.C., 628 F.2d 932 (5th Cir.1980), cert.

National Ass'n of Air Traffic Specialists, 836 F.Supp. 1204, 1206 n. 3, 1211 n. 6 (D.Md.1993), aff'd without opinion, 34 F.3d 1066 (4th Cir.1994) (stating that elected union leaders of 1,700-member union were public figures); Batson v. Shiflett, 325 Md. 684, 722, 728, 602 A.2d 1191 (1992) (plaintiff who was elected president of union local was a public figure); Miles v. Perry, 11 Conn.App. 584, 592 n. 7, 529 A.2d 199 (1987) (noting that union officers are generally considered public figures for purposes of union business); Lins v. Evening News Ass'n, 129 Mich.App. 419, 432, 342 N.W.2d 573 (1983) (deciding that union officers were limited public figures); City Firefighters Union, Local 28 v. Duci, 104 Misc.2d 498, 503 n. 7, 428 N.Y.S.2d 772 (1976) (concluding that union officers are public figures). See also Hanlon v. Davis, 76 Md.App. 339, 357, 545 A.2d 72 (1988) (noting that trial court judge instructed jury that president of union was a public figure).

725-726, only if that speech addresses the public controversy into which the limited purpose public figure has voluntarily injected herself. See Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 351, 94 S.Ct. 2997, 3012-13, 41 L.Ed.2d 789 (1974). See also Waldbaum v. Fairchild Publications, Inc., 627 F.2d 1287, 1298 (D.C.Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 898, 101 S.Ct. 266, 66 L.Ed.2d 128 (1980) (stating that the alleged defamation must have been "germane" to the limited purpose public figure's participation in the controversy). If, however, the contested speech does not address the controversy into which the limited purpose public figure has thrust herself, then the States may impose liability "on a less demanding showing than that required by New York Times Co. [v. Sullivan]," as long as they do not impose liability without fault. Gertz v. Robert Welch,

Inc., supra 418 U.S. at 347-348, 94 S.Ct. at 3010-3011. "Whether ... speech addresses a matter of public concern must be determined by the content, form, and context of a given statement, as revealed by the whole record." Connick v. Myers, 461 U.S. 138, 147-148, 103 S.Ct. 1684, 1690, 75 L.Ed.2d 708 (1983). After reviewing the entire record and considering the content, form, and context of the caricatures, I am compelled to conclude that the speech in this case addressed a matter of public concern--the plaintiff's candidacy for the presidency of Local 509.[5] See Connick v. Myers,

[5]The court has placed great emphasis on what it terms as "the defendant's own admission [that he] did not intend to influence the union election." Ante at 371. In my opinion, the defendant has done no such thing. He testified that he "was trying to state that [the plaintiff's] statements during the campaign were ridiculous." The defendant stated also that the caricatures "were the most absurd pictures that I could think of, and [the plaintiff's] views were the most absurd I could think of." In addition, the defendant stated that "[t]he picture was not to be of any sexual nature, except of [the plaintiff] as a political candidate.

supra 461 U.S. at 147-148, 103 S.Ct. at 1690. Although I find the content of the caricatures to be totally repulsive, even "the most repulsive speech enjoys immunity provided it falls short of a deliberate or reckless untruth." Linn v. United Plant Guard Workers of Am., Local 114, 383 U.S. 53, 63, 86 S.Ct. 657, 663, 15 L.Ed.2d 582 (1966). As a result, liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress should be imposed on the defendant only if the plaintiff can prove by clear and convincing evidence that the caricatures contained a false statement of fact

I wanted to kind of degrade her as a political candidate, but that's it." Furthermore, the defendant testified that he was not attempting to discourage people from voting for the plaintiff simply because he believed that they already had decided not to vote for her. Finally, both the plaintiff and other union members recognized that the caricatures were related to the union election. Thus, it is clear to me that the defendant intended to lampoon the plaintiff's candidacy with his caricatures.

and that the defendant had knowledge of the falsity or had acted with reckless disregard of the truth. See Hustler Magazine, Inc. v. Falwell, supra 485 U.S. at 56, 108 S.Ct. at 882.

Even if the plaintiff was a private figure, despite her entering the election campaign for the presidency of Local 509, the actual malice standard remains the appropriate standard to use in this case. See Batson v. Shiflett, 325 Md. 684, 728, 602 A.2d 1191 (1992); McKinnon v. Smith, 52 Misc.2d 349, 352, 275 N.Y.S.2d 900 (1966). The Supreme Court of the United States has used the actual malice standard in free speech cases involving unions because "federal policies favor[ ] uninhibited, robust, and wide-open debate in labor disputes." Old Dominion Branch No. 496, Nat'l Ass'n of Letter Carriers v. Austin, 418 U.S. 264, 273, 94 S.Ct. 2770, 2776, 41 L.Ed.2d 745 (1974) [Letter Carriers]. The Supreme Court has recognized that "exaggerated rhetoric was commonplace in labor disputes and protected by federal law." Id. at 286, 94 S.Ct. at 2782. Therefore, in order to avoid "unwarranted intrusion upon free discussion" in labor disputes, the Court adopted by analogy the actual malice standard used in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, supra 376 U.S. at 279-280, 84 S.Ct. at 725-726. Linn v. United Plant Guard Workers, supra 383 U.S. at 65, 86 S.Ct. at 664. As a result, the Supreme Court held that Federal labor policy preempts State libel actions for defamatory statements, made in the course of a labor dispute, which were published without knowledge of their falsity or with reckless disregard for the truth. See id. Subsequently, in Letter Carriers, the Supreme Court rejected the argument that the actual malice standard applied only in the context of a labor-management dispute or a representation campaign. See Letter Carriers, supra at 278-279, 94 S.Ct. at 2778.[6] Instead, the Supreme Court reasoned that "application [of the actual malice standard] of Linn [v. United Plant Guard Workers] must turn on whether the defamatory publication is made in a context where the policies of the federal labor laws leading to protection for freedom of speech are significantly implicated." Letter Carriers, supra 418 U.S. at 279, 94 S.Ct. at 2778.

In the present case, the Labor Management Reporting and Disclosure Act (LMRDA) is the relevant federal law because the controversy

[6]Although the labor-management relations system in Letter Carriers was established by an Executive Order and not the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA), the Supreme Court dismissed the distinction stating that, "the same federal policies favoring uninhibited, robust, and wide-open debate in labor disputes are applicable" in both cases. Old Dominion Branch No. 496, Nat'l Ass'n of Letter Carriers v. Austin, 418 U.S. 264, 277, 94 S.Ct. 2770, 2777-2778, 41 L.Ed.2d 745 (1974).

arose in the context of union officer elections.[7] See Petersen v. Dole, 956 F.2d 1219, 1223 (D.C.Cir.1992); 29 U.S.C. § 481 (1988). "[T]he [LMRDA's] overriding objective was to ensure that unions would be democratically governed, and responsive to the will of the union membership as expressed in open, periodic elections." Finnegan v. Leu, 456 U.S. 431, 441, 102 S.Ct. 1867, 1873, 72 L.Ed.2d 239 (1982). Congress "recognized that democracy would be assured only if union members are free to discuss union policies and criticize the [7]The LMRDA governs, inter alia, "mixed" labor unions. See Celli v. Shoell, 40 F.3d 324, 327 (10th Cir.1994). A "mixed" union has members that are working for private employers and members that are working for either the Federal government or the State. Id. In the present case, the plaintiff and defendant were both members of Local 509 of the Service Employees International Union. The local was comprised of both State workers and workers in private agencies. In addition, the local was part of the "Alliance," which was the "recognized bargaining agent" for the local. Thus, it is likely that the Local 509 is subject to the LMRDA, despite the paucity of clarity in the record.

leadership without fear of reprisal. Congress also recognized that this freedom is particularly critical, and deserves vigorous protection, in the context of election campaigns. For it is in elections that members can wield their power, and directly express their approval or disapproval of the union leadership." United Steelworkers of Am. v. Sadlowski, 457 U.S. 102, 112, 102 S.Ct. 2339, 2346, 72 L.Ed.2d 707 (1982). Thus, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, in the context of a union election, implicates the same federal labor policies leading to the protection of freedom of speech as in Linn v. United Plant Guard Workers, supra 383 U.S. at 65, 86 S.Ct. at 664, and Letter Carriers, supra 418 U.S. at 279, 94 S.Ct. at 2778. See Henry v. National Ass'n of Air Traffic Specialists, supra at 1211; Ross v. Duke, 116 Ariz. 298, 300-301,

By imposing an outrageousness standard on union election speech, today's decision will permit a candidate for a union office to seek damages for emotional distress from fellow union members who "say naughty things during [election campaigns]." Linn v. United Plant Guard Workers, supra 383 U.S. at 67, 86 S.Ct. at 665 (Black, J., dissenting). The Supreme Court has recognized the dangerously chilling effect of such a standard on free speech stating that "'[o]utrageousness' in the area of political and social discourse has an inherent subjectiveness about it which would allow a jury to impose liability on the basis of the jurors' tastes or views, or perhaps on the basis of their dislike of a particular expression. An 'outrageousness' standard thus runs afoul of our longstanding refusal to allow damages to be awarded because the speech in question may have an adverse emotional impact on the audience." Hustler Magazine, Inc. v. Falwell, supra 485 U.S. at 55, 108 S. Ct. at 882. It is unavoidable, therefore, that the court's imposition of an outrageousness standard will chill protected speech in the context of a union election. See L. Tribe, American Constitutional Law § 13-26, at 1131-1132 (1988). Thus, to provide "adequate 'breathing space' to the freedoms protected by the First Amendment," the actual malice standard is the appropriate standard to use in the context of a union election. Hustler Magazine, Inc. v. Falwell, supra at 56, 108 S. Ct. at 882. See Beruan v. French, 56 Cal.App.3d 825, 828-829, 128 Cal.Rptr. 869 (1976) (stating that labor union operates like a system of government and strong policies favor the full exercise of the right to free speech in union election campaigns).

Where the actual malice standard applies, the "sine qua non of recovery ... is the existence of falsehood." Letter Carriers, supra 418 U.S. at 283, 94 S.Ct. at 2781. In the present case, the plaintiff has not proved that the caricatures contained a false statement of fact. Accordingly, I dissent.[8]

[8]Because I agree with the court's decision to vacate the judgment on the plaintiff's two civil rights claims, ante at 372, I would reverse the entire judgment in favor of the defendant.

vs.
David HELLER.[1]
Civ. A. No. 90-3269.
Superior Court of Massachusetts.
July 9, 1993.
MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

J. HAROLD FLANNERY, Justice.

The plaintiff, Sylvia Smith Bowman ("Bowman"), is a 66 year old woman who at the time of the incident that gives rise to this action was a Social Work Supervisor in the Worcester Office of the Massachusetts Department of Public Welfare ("the Department"). Bowman worked for the Department from 1967 until August of 1991, when she left pursuant to an agreement. The defendant, David Heller ("Heller"), worked at the same Worcester Office at all times relevant to this matter, and continues to work for the Department. Throughout the summer and fall of 1987, Bowman was running for the presidency of Local 509 of the Service Employees International Union ("the Union"). On or about October 23, 1987, Heller prepared and distributed to various co-employees two photocopies of caricatures depicting Bowman's head and name, taken from her campaign postcard, superimposed over nude and partially nude female bodies ("the photocopies"). Heller was suspended from his employment for one week, from April 25 to April 29, 1988, as a result of this incident. Bowman now sues Heller for intentional infliction of emotional distress (Count IV), reckless infliction of emotional distress (Count V), and violation of her right to run for Union office and to be free from sexual harassment pursuant to the Massachusetts Civil Rights Act (Counts VII and XIII).

[1]The original defendants to this action, with the exception of David Heller, entered into a Settlement Agreement with the plaintiff; the action was therefore dismissed as to them pursuant to the "Agreement for Judgment" adopted and ordered by this court (Dortch, J.) on December 18, 1991.

On or about January 12, 1988, Bowman posted in the Worcester Welfare Office a document titled "Charges Against David Heller" (the "Charges") which she had previously photocopied onto Union stationary. The Charges were those brought by Arthur Casey, a Vice President of the Union, against Heller on Bowman's behalf. A month later, on or about February 11, 1988, Bowman prepared a memorandum to her immediate supervisor regarding sicktime she was planning to take which referenced Heller and the photocopies incident (the "Sicktime Memo"). Heller asserts in his counterclaims against Bowman that these two documents were defamatory.

The plaintiff's claims and defendant's counterclaims were tried jury waived from April 5 to April 14, 1993. On the basis of the evidence, which consisted of 34 exhibits[2] and the testimony of twelve witnesses, I make the following findings and rulings pursuant to Mass.R.Civ.P. 52(a).

Bowman graduated from Vassar in 1949 and worked in various companies holding managerial positions before she became a social worker for the Massachusetts Department of Public Welfare in 1967. She was promoted to supervisor in 1970, and worked in such capacity until she left the Department in August of 1991 pursuant to the agreement referred to in note 1, above. During most of her career as a social worker, Bowman was also active in Local 509 of the Service Employees International Union whose members include social workers in the Department and other state employees. At various times from 1967 to 1987 Bowman served in a number of Union offices, including Statewide Recording Secretary, Trustee, Vice President of the Worcester Region's Welfare Chapter, Joint Board Member, Executive Board Member, Trial Board Delegate, and Steward.

In 1987 Bowman decided to make a second run for the presidency of the Union (her first attempt in 1985 having been unsuccessful), and she campaigned actively throughout the summer and fall of that year. Heller opposed Bowman's candidacy, supporting instead the incumbent president, Fred Trusten. Heller worked on Trusten's campaign by passing out campaign literature and his own written endorsement of Trusten to his co-workers (ex. 27, 28).

On or about October 23, 1987, during the election campaign period, Heller prepared and distributed two photocopies of nude and partially nude female bodies in sexually explicit poses, superimposed with Bowman's face and name taken from her campaign postcard (ex. 3A, 3B). One photocopy depicted Bowman in a masturbatory position, completely nude, and the other depicted her partially nude, holding a banana, with her legs spread apart to expose her genitals. The original photographs (prior to their alteration by Heller) were taken from a pornographic magazine. Heller's preparation and distribution of these photocopies took place at work during working hours, and with the use of office photocopy equipment. Heller either gave or showed the photocopies to at least five co-workers: Richard Williamson, Victor Lempicki, Scott Butler, Kenneth Saunders, and Bowman's campaign treasurer, Jeanne Lacey. It was Heller's practice to create and distribute "satirical" paste-up photocopies around the office (ex. 5A-5E). In addition, he would often display such photocopies by hanging them up on his cubicle walls. With the photocopies of Bowman, however, Heller did not hang them on his walls and, according to his testimony, he gave or showed them only to people he thought would appreciate their "off-color" humor. Heller testified repeatedly that his intent was to make Bowman "look ridiculous", as ridiculous as he felt her ideas were during the Union election campaign. Heller also testified, however, that it was not his intent to sway votes or to induce people not to vote for Bowman.

While comics, jokes, and satirical pictures circulated regularly in the Worcester Welfare

Office, the testimony of several witnesses established that the photocopies of Bowman stood apart from the rest both in terms of their sexually explicit content and their focus on a specific co-worker from the same office. Heller himself had never before used pornographic pictures for his paste-up creations (featuring men for the most part). Given the nature of the Bowman photocopies and the office practice of circulating "humorous" material, it is fairly inferable from the evidence, and so I find, that Heller was aware when distributing the photocopies that Bowman would be upset by them if she saw them, and furthermore, that she was substantially certain to see them.

The photocopies of Bowman did indeed achieve circulation beyond those co- workers Heller originally gave them to. For example,

Jeanne Lacey testified that she saw various Department employees making additional copies of the Bowman photocopies, and Susan Caramielo, a witness for the defense, stated that she first saw one or both of the photocopies as they were being passed among a group of Department employees from different floors of the Worcester Office. Ultimately, Scott Butler, one of the people who received the photocopies directly from Heller, in turn gave copies of them to his friend and Bowman's campaign coordinator, John Stockman ("Stockman"). On or about October 26, 1987, Stockman told Bowman about the photocopies and described their contents, but he tried to minimize the situation in order not to distract her from her campaign. He and Bowman decided that she should not see the photocopies until she was done with her active campaigning. Although Bowman asked around the Worcester

Office to determine how widespread the distribution of the photocopies was, she tried to make light of the incident in order to keep the campaign issues focused.

On or about November 18, 1987, after active campaigning for the Union election had ended but before the election results were known, Bowman finally received the photocopies from Stockman. They met at a luncheonette during the morning break from work and Stockman gave the photocopies to her in a sealed envelope, advising her to look at them when she was at home. Bowman opened the envelope once she was alone, however, and experienced such shock that she does not recall clearly what she did afterwards. According to the testimony of Cindy Cardone ("Cardone"), the owner of a bookstore near the luncheonette at the time of this incident, Bowman came into her store that same morning in great physical and emotional distress, unable to speak or breath normally and perspiring heavily. Cardone feared that Bowman was suffering a heart attack or stroke. When Bowman was finally able to speak, she explained that she had just had a great shock and showed the photocopies to Cardone. Feeling that Bowman needed some privacy to pull herself together, Cardone closed her store for approximately 45 minutes.

Bowman testified to feeling degraded, publicly humiliated, and vulnerable upon seeing the photocopies; she also felt that the matter was too serious for her to remain silent. During the remainder of the day and for the rest of the week, Bowman showed the photocopies to various Department and Union Officials in an effort to elicit some remedial response. As part of this effort, on or about November 19, 1987, Bowman took pictures of Heller and his work station, where he had other paste-up photocopies displayed, in order to identify him as the perpetrator of the photocopies (ex. 21A-21E). One of the pictures she took showed the back of a client's head. Heller complained about Bowman's photograph, and the Department promptly investigated and took disciplinary action against her.

In contrast, the Department was slow and tentative in its response to Bowman's complaint against Heller. The Department conducted no official investigation until late December. On or about December 30, 1987, Heller admitted in a Department interview that he had prepared and distributed the photocopies to five co-workers (ex. 32). On April 1, 1988, the Department notified Bowman that it found Heller's actions regarding the photocopies to constitute sexual harassment and that it would take appropriate action (ex. 23). Later that month, Heller was suspended from work without pay for five days, to which Heller responded by "grieving" the suspension. On February 15, 1989, almost a year later, Heller made a public, written apology to Bowman (ex. 30). On January 23, 1990, Heller signed a Memorandum of Understanding with the Department agreeing to "reasonably avoid physical and verbal contact" with Bowman in the workplace (ex. 31).

The shock and emotional distress Bowman experienced upon first seeing the photocopies persisted and Bowman was eventually diagnosed as suffering from Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder ("PTSD"). Bowman's current treating psychotherapist, Maureen Lavallee, Ph.D., testified that PTSD is triggered by an event outside the normal range of human experience and manifests in symptoms such as psychogenic amnesia, disassociation, flashbacks, fearfulness, an exaggerated startle response, psychic numbness, problems with concentration and memory, uncontrollable crying, loss of trust, and loss of interest in formerly pleasurable activities. Dr. Lavallee further testified that although Bowman's past medical and mental health history make her present symptoms more severe, the specific event which caused the PTSD was the photocopies incident. That testimony was essentially uncontradicted. I find that neither the loss of the Union election nor childhood trauma is the cause of Bowman's emotional distress and related symptoms. I find, rather, that Heller's preparation and distribution at work of photocopies which depict Bowman in sexually explicit poses and hold her up to ridicule, an event outside the normal range of human experience, caused Bowman's emotional distress and PTSD.

Heller's counterclaims of defamation stem from two events. On or about January 12, 1988, Bowman posted in the Worcester Welfare Office the "Charges Against David Heller" (the "Charges") filed with the Union Trial Board (ex. 7). The Charges had been prepared by Bowman and signed by Arthur Casey, a Vice President of the Union, who was bringing the complaint against Heller on Bowman's behalf. The Charges actually filed with the Trial Board were on blank paper, but Bowman copied them onto Union letterhead prior to posting them in the Worcester Office in order to comply with the contractual requirement that anything posted on the Union bulletin board be on Union letterhead (ex. 22). Other than the stationery on which they appeared, the posted charges were a true copy of the charges as filed. Furthermore, it was a practice of the Union to post charges filed with the Trial Board on the Union bulletin board, as long as the outcome of the trial was also posted.

On or about February 11, 1988, Bowman sent a memorandum (the "Sicktime Memo") to her supervisor, with copies to others who had management or record keeping responsibilities, regarding sicktime she was planning to take (ex. 8). She also gave copies of the memo to various Union officials such as the Union stewards from her office. In the memo, Bowman referred to the photocopies incident as a "sexual assault." I find that Bowman used the term "sexual assault" because of a good faith belief that the term was appropriate to describe the sort of personal attack the photocopies represented, and that those receiving the memo would not have understood the term to mean an actual crime called sexual assault. In addition, I find that Heller has not established by a preponderance of the evidence that his reputation was injured among a substantial and respectable group of people in his work or residential community with regard to either of the incidents above.

Based on the foregoing facts, I rule as follows on the law.[3] To begin, Bowman's tort claims allege both intentional and reckless infliction of emotional distress (Counts IV and V). According to Massachusetts law, however,

[3]The plaintiff urges this court to estop defendant Heller from relitigating issues of fact and law already decided in a prior arbitration proceeding which determined that the Department of Public Welfare had just cause to suspend Heller from work as a result of the photocopies incident. S.E.I.U., Local 509 v. Department of Public Welfare (OER ARD # 1078, November 21, 1991). The plaintiff cites Miles v. Aetna Casualty & Surety Co., 412 Mass. 424 (1992), for the proposition that parties may be bound by an arbitration decision under certain circumstances. I do not apply that principle here because I am uncertain whether the arbitration was a full-blown trial of the issues. In any event, my findings agree with those of the arbitrator.

intentional and reckless infliction of emotional distress have essentially the same elements and burdens of proof. See Simon v. Solomon, 385 Mass. 91, 95 (1982); Tilton v. Franklin, 24 Mass.App.Ct. 110, 112 (1987). Thus, in order to hold Heller liable for damages suffered as a result of either, Bowman must show that (1) Heller intended to inflict emotional distress or he knew or should have known emotional distress was the likely result of his conduct; (2) Heller's conduct was extreme and outrageous, beyond all possible bounds of decency and utterly intolerable in a civilized community; (3) Heller's actions were the cause of Bowman's distress; and (4) the emotional distress suffered by Bowman was severe and of a nature that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it. Agis v. Howard Johnson Co., 371 Mass. 140, 144-145 (1976).

By Heller's own admission, his intent in creating and distributing the pornographic photocopies was to ridicule Bowman. For this purpose, he chose to superimpose Bowman's face and name onto images that were particularly suggestive and sexually explicit, reducing Bowman to nothing more than a sexual object. While Heller argues that he never intended or expected Bowman to actually see the photocopies (whatever his intent may have been in creating and distributing them), the fact remains that circulation of non-work related "humorous" material was common practice in the office. Heller was not only well aware of this, he himself initiated such circulation of his other photocopied works on several occasions. Given the immediate notoriety which the Bowman photocopies were certain to achieve, Heller, at the very least, knew or should have known that

Bowman was not only likely to see the photocopies, but was likely to suffer emotional distress as a result.

That Heller's conduct was extreme and outrageous is amply supported by the photocopies themselves. No one who testified from the Worcester Welfare Office, including Heller, could recall another "humorous" picture or photograph passed around which even remotely resembled the Bowman photocopies. Indeed, the kind of gross, personal, and pornographic attack that the photocopies represent is well outside the bounds of decency in a civilized society. During testimony at trial, Dr. Maureen Lavallee, Bowman's treating psychotherapist, also characterized the photocopies incident as a traumatic event outside the normal range of human experience. The second element of the Agis standard is thus satisfied as well.

Dr. Lavallee's uncontradicted medical testimony furthermore established a causal link between Heller's creation and distribution of the photocopies and Bowman's Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder ("PTSD"). While Heller suggests that Bowman's own troubled medical and mental health history mitigates, if not eliminates, any liability on his part, such argument directly contravenes the general tort principle that an actor takes the victim as he finds her. Bowman's medical and mental health history therefore may make her present symptoms more severe, but it does not lessen the causal link between Heller's conduct and Bowman's injuries.

Finally, the severity of Bowman's emotional distress is borne out by the diagnosis of PTSD. Consistent with that diagnosis, Bowman has experienced (and continues to experience) a range of symptoms from psychogenic amnesia, to an exaggerated startle response, to loss of interest in formerly pleasurable activities. Bowman is still in active treatment and therapy, and according to Dr. Lavallee, such treatment will probably have to continue for several more years.

Even if Bowman has proven all the elements of intentional infliction of emotional distress by a preponderance of the evidence, Heller argues that Hustler Magazine v. Falwell, 485 U.S. 46 (1988), nevertheless precludes Bowman from maintaining this claim against him. In Hustler Magazine Magazine, the Supreme Court held that the First and Fourteenth Amendments prohibit public figures and public officials from recovering damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress based on the publication of caricatures "doubtless gross and repugnant in the eyes of most," without a further showing that the publication contains a false statement of fact which was made with actual malice. Id.

The applicability of Hustler Magazine 's First Amendment analysis depends initially on whether or not Bowman can be deemed a "public figure." Heller states that by running for the Union presidency, Bowman voluntarily injected herself into a particular public controversy and thereby became a public figure for a limited range of issues. Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 351-352 (1974). Several Massachusetts cases have in fact more specifically held that union officials or those running for union office are public figures within the meaning of Gertz. See Materia v. Huff, 394 Mass. 328, 331 (1985); Lyons v. New Mass Media, Inc., 390 Mass. 51, 55-56 (1983). It therefore seems that Bowman became a public

Despite Bowman's status as a public figure, Hustler Magazine is distinguishable from the present case in two important aspects. First, the ad parody at issue in Hustler Magazine contained an articulable statement and criticism about the kind of public figure Falwell was. By depicting Falwell as having engaged in a drunken, incestuous rendezvous with his mother, the magazine was implying sexual and moral hypocrisy on the part of Falwell, the nationally known leader of the Moral Majority. By contrast, there is no articulable political statement which can be gleaned from the photocopies of Bowman. Although Heller stated that he intended to make Bowman look as ridiculous as he felt her ideas were during the Union campaign, he was unable during the trial to articulate exactly how the pornographic images of Bowman conveyed such an opinion. See, e.g., Trial Transcript, Vol. 7 at 39. It appears that Heller could not so state because the photocopies were nothing more than a reduction of Bowman to a sexual object and an attack on her as a woman, rather than as a political candidate.

The United States Supreme Court has long recognized that not all speech is of equal First Amendment importance. In FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978), the Court stated that speech that is " 'vulgar, 'offensive,' and 'shocking' " is "not entitled to absolute constitutional protection under all circumstances." Id. at 747. See also, Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568 (1942) (State can lawfully punish speech that by its very nature inflicts injury or incites to immediate violence). Thus a second and perhaps more crucial point of departure between Hustler Magazine and the instant case is that while the Falwell ad parody was published inside the front cover of a national magazine, Heller "published" his photocopies of Bowman at their mutual place of employment. Heller's attempt to characterize the photocopies as constitutionally valid political speech must therefore be additionally scrutinized in light of the employment context which frames the entire incident.

First Amendment concerns are subject to various restrictions in the workplace where employees may be a captive audience or countervailing employer interests may take precedence. See Lewis v. Director of the Division of Employment Security, 379 Mass. 918 (1980) (denial of unemployment benefits affirmed where General Dynamics employee wore "Strike--G.D." jacket to work); Bryson v. City of Waycross, 888 F.2d 1562 (11th Cir.1989) (police captain's statements so disruptive to police department that city's interest in assuring efficient police protection outweighed captain's free speech interest). See also, McMullen v. Carson, 568 F.Supp. 937 (M.D.Fla.1983). One permissible workplace restriction on First Amendment freedoms is the prohibition against speech, expression, and/or conduct which constitutes sexual harassment. As one United States District Court recently stated:

> "[Pornographic] pictures and verbal harassment are not protected speech because they act as discriminatory conduct in the form of a hostile work environment." See Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609, 628, 104 S.Ct. 3244, 3255, 82 L.Ed.2d 462 (1984). ("[P]otentially expressive activities that produce special harms distinct from their communicative impact ... are entitled to no constitutional protection."); Hishon v. King & Spalding, 467 U.S. 69, 78, 104

> S.Ct. 2229, 2235, 81 L.Ed.2d 59 (1984); Strauss, Sexist Speech in the Workplace, 25 Harv.C.R.-C.L.L.Rev. 1, 38-41 (1990). In this respect, the speech at issue is indistinguishable from speech that comprises a crime, such as threats of violence or blackmail, of which there can be no doubt of the authority of the state to punish. (citations omitted)

Robinson v. Jacksonville Shipyards, Inc., 760 F.Supp. 1486, 1535 (M.D.Fla.1991). Thus in the employment context, when "expression" becomes nothing more than prohibited sexual harassment, a perpetrator cannot shield himself from tort or other civil liability by claiming First Amendment privilege. Had Heller distributed the Bowman photocopies elsewhere the analysis might be different; however, Heller chose to pass the photocopies out at work to his and Bowman's co-employees. In so doing, he crossed the line from any semblance of free expression into unlawful conduct specifically prohibited by several Massachusetts statutes.

In Count XIII of her Complaint, Bowman alleges that Heller violated her civil right to be free from sexual harassment pursuant to the Massachusetts Civil Rights Act ("MCRA"). Section 11H of M.G.L. c. 12 provides a state remedy for interference or attempts to interfere with the exercise or enjoyment of rights secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States or rights secured by the Constitution or laws of the Commonwealth by threats, intimidation, or coercion. The private counterpart to section 11H is section 11I, which authorizes a private cause of action for similar interference with secured rights.

Bowman's statutory right to be free from sexual harassment specifically arises from M.G.L. c. 214 § 1C which provides in relevant part:

> A person shall have the right to be free from sexual harassment, as defined in > chapter one hundred and fifty-one B and fifty-one C.

Sexual harassment is defined in turn by M.G.L. c. 151B § 1(18) as:

> Sexual advances, requests for sexual favors, and other verbal or physical conduct of a sexual nature when (a) submission to or rejection of such advances, requests or conduct is made either explicitly or implicitly a term or condition of employment or as a basis for employment decisions; (b) such advances, requests or conduct have the purpose or effect of unreasonably interfering with an individual's work performance by creating an intimidating, hostile, humiliating or sexually offensive work environment.

Putting the above statutes together, Bowman must show by a preponderance of the evidence that (1) Heller's conduct was of a sexual nature; (2) it unreasonably interfered with her work performance; (3) by creating a hostile, intimidating, humiliating, or sexually offensive work environment; and (4) such interference was accomplished by threats, intimidation, or coercion within the of M.G.L. c. 12 §§ 11H and

With respect to the first element, it is beyond doubt that the photocopies created and distributed by Heller constitute verbal conduct of a sexual nature. Clearly, images of a woman masturbating or exposing her genitals are explicitly sexual images. With respect to the second and third elements, whether or not Heller's conduct unreasonably interfered with Bowman's work performance is measured in part by the degree to which the conduct created a hostile work environment. In Meritor Savings Bank v. Vinson, 477 U.S. 57 (1986), the Supreme Court stated that for sexual harassment to be actionable, it must be sufficiently severe or pervasive to alter the conditions of the victim's employment and create an abusive working environment. The Supreme Judicial Court essentially relied on the same analysis in

College-Town, Division of Interco, Inc. v. Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination, 400 Mass. 156 (1987), when it held that the behavior of Chester Broad, College- Town's supervisory employee, was "sufficiently pervasive to alter the conditions of [Loretta] Rizzi's employment, and thus created a sexually harassing working environment." Id. at 162.

Traditionally, the severity or pervasiveness of the harassing conduct was to be measured from the standpoint of a reasonable person in the plaintiff's position. See Gnerre v. Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination, 402 Mass. 502, 507 (1988). The growing trend nationally, however, seems to be one of adopting a reasonable woman standard for sexual harassment cases. As the Eight Circuit Court of Appeals very recently stated in Burns v. McGregor Electronic Industries, Inc., for example, "We must view the harassment from the victim's perspective, and in this case the victim is a woman." 989 F.2d 959, 965 (8th Cir.1993).. The Court then went on to cite the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit in Andrews v. City of Philadelphia, 895 F.2d 1469, 1485-86 (3d Cir.1989):

> Obscene language and pornography quite possibly could be regarded as highly offensive to a woman who seeks to deal with her fellow employees and clients with professional dignity and without the barrier of sexual differentiation and abuse. Although men may find these actions harmless and innocent, it is highly possible that women may feel otherwise.

Id. See also, Robinson v. Jacksonville Shipyards, Inc., 760 F.Supp. 1486, 1526 (M.D.Fla.1991) (to implement fully the promise of Title VII, "the standards for assessing women's psychological harm due to harassment must begin to reflect women's sensitivity to behavior once condoned as acceptable."); Ellison

v. Brady, 924 F.2d 872, 879 (9th Cir.1991) ("We ... prefer to analyze harassment from the victim's perspective. A complete understanding of the victim's view requires, among other things, an analysis of the different perspectives of men and women."); Yates v. Avco Corp., 819 F.2d 630, 637 & n. 2 (6th Cir.1987) (stating that "men and women are vulnerable in different ways and offended by different behavior").

In adopting a reasonable woman standard by which to gage the severity or pervasiveness of sexually harassing conduct, courts seem to be recognizing that the reasonable person standard often allows a male bias to creep in, thereby perpetuating the status quo. If the purpose of laws providing remedies for sexual harassment at work is to break down barriers to the full participation of women in the workplace,

College-Town, Division of Interco, Inc. v. Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination, 400 Mass. 156, 162 (1987), then the conduct must indeed be analyzed from a woman's perspective. Heller argues, however, that when analyzed from either the perspective of a reasonable woman or reasonable person, his conduct was not sufficiently severe or pervasive to alter the conditions of Bowman's employment.

Heller relies in part on the theory that one incident of sexually offensive conduct does not a hostile environment make. He claims, rather, that Bowman must show a pattern of offensive conduct. Heller thus seems to be urging the court to apply a numerosity requirement without regard to the fact that even one incident, if severe enough, could quite possibly alter the conditions of employment for the victim. The landlord perpetrator in Gnerre

v. Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination, 402 Mass. 502, 507 (1988), made a similar argument in the discriminatory housing context, to which the Supreme Judicial Court replied:

> [W]e specifically reject Gnerre's suggestion that we impose, as a matter of law, a quantitative requirement on the incidents of harassment that will constitute actionable sex discrimination. In College-Town, this court did not impose such a requirement in the context of sexual harassment in the workplace.

This court similarly rejects the argument that Bowman must meet some sort of numerosity requirement by showing a pattern of offensive behavior on Heller's part.

Despite Heller's attempt to characterize his conduct as merely one isolated incident, the way in which he prepared and distributed the Bowman photocopies renders his conduct not only severe, but pervasive as well. The photocopies at issue in this case unambiguously targeted Bowman. By taking both her name and her face from one photograph and superimposing them onto other photographs of nude and partially nude female bodies, Heller specifically made Bowman the subject of the pornographic images. It was a most unwelcome appropriation of her person, and specifically her sexuality, for his hostile purposes. Heller did not then merely place the photocopies on Bowman's desk or show them only to her, he distributed them at work where they soon proliferated throughout the office. The pornographic photocopies of Bowman thus infested Bowman's workplace. They made her feel "fearful," "vulnerable," and "degraded." Knowing so many of her co-workers had seen them and laughed at them made Bowman reluctant to go to work. The entire episode altered the conditions of employment for Bowman, as it would have for the reasonable woman and indeed for the reasonable person. Heller's creation and distribution of the photocopies clearly created an "intimidating, hostile, humiliating or sexually offensive work environment." M.G.L. c. 151B § 1(18). Heller's conduct thus violated Bowman's right to be free from sexual harassment.[4] M.G.L. c. 214 § 1C.

Because Bowman invokes M.G.L. c. 12 §§ 11H and 11I to challenge Heller's interference with her civil rights, she must show that the interference was accomplished by threats, intimidation, or coercion. Heller vigorously argues that in order for his conduct to be deemed threatening, intimidating, or coercive within the meaning of the MCRA, it must have [4]I have applied the reasonable woman standard here because, for the reasons stated, it is the correct one. I also find, however, that Heller's conduct was impermissible sexual harassment by the standard of the reasonable person.

involved actual or potential physical confrontation accompanied by a threat of harm. Heller relies for this proposition on Bally v. Northeastern University, 403 Mass 713 (1989) and its progeny.[5] In Bally, the plaintiff, a student athlete, claimed that the university violated his civil rights by requiring drug testing as a condition of participation in intercollegiate sports. The court differentiated Bally's claim from others for which it had previously granted relief under the MCRA on two grounds. First, the previous cases all involved measures directed toward a particular individual or class of persons, whereas Northeastern's drug policy involved

[5]See e.g. Longval v. Commissioner of Correction, 404 Mass. 325, 333 (1989); Layne v. Superintendent, Massachusetts Correctional Institution, Cedar Junction, 406 Mass. 156, 158 (1989); Biggins v. Hazen Paper Co., 953 F.2d 1405, 1425 (1st Cir.1992).

"indiscriminate, impartially administered testing." Id. at 719. Second, cases such as Batchelder v. Allied Stores Corp., 400 Mass. 686 (1985), Bell v. Mazza, 394 Mass. 176 (1985), and O'Connell v. Chasdi, 400 Mass. 686 (1987), "each involved physical confrontation accompanied by a threat of harm." Id.

Yet Bally itself expressly recognized that "threats, intimidation, and coercion" could involve other than physical confrontation, by stating, "Although Redgrave did not involve physical confrontation, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's action involved the loss of a contract right." Bally at 720. The claim in Redgrave v. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., 399 Mass. 93 (1987), had concerned the coercive effect of economic sanctions on the plaintiff's right to engage in unrelated political speech. In other words, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's cancellation of its contract with Redgrave was a "measure directed toward a particular individual." Bally at 718. Furthermore, in analyzing an MCRA claim, the Court in Deas v. Dempsy, 403 Mass. 468, 471 (1988), defined coercion as "the application to another of such force, either physical or moral, as to constrain him to do against his will something he would not otherwise have done." (emphasis added).

The overly narrow reading of "threats, intimidation, and coercion" articulated in subsequent cases, citing Bally as authority, is also inconsistent with the interpretation of similar terms in other statutes. See e.g., Smith v. Stechel, 510 F.2d 1162, 1164 (9th Cir.1975) (firing employees who aided others in exercising their rights by renting apartments to members of minority groups would constitute threat, intimidation, coercion, or interference under Fair Housing Act, 42 U.S.C. § 3617); United States v. Bruce, 353 F.2d 474, 476-79 (5th Cir.1965) (economic sanctions by landlord, interfering with right to vote, constituted coercion); United States v. Beaty, 288 F.2d 653, 656 (6th Cir.1961) (threats of eviction if tenants exercised their right to vote constituted coercion).

Sexual harassment, by its very nature, is threatening, intimidating, and coercive. It is a crude way of telling women that they are neither wanted nor valued in the workplace. As the Supreme Judicial Court stated in College-Town, Division of Interco., Inc. v. Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination, 400 Mass. 156, 162 (1987), "A work environment pervaded by harassment or abuse, with the resulting intimidation, humiliation, and stigmatization, poses a formidable barrier to full participation of an individual in the workplace." Sexual harassment thus creates a barrier, based solely on gender, to a woman's full and untrammelled participation in the workplace.

Heller's photocopies of Bowman explicitly attacked her as a woman. They were intimidating because they communicated to her that despite her long commitment to both her work and union activity, she could quite easiiy be reduced to nothing more than a naked woman, spread-eagled and exposed. Such a message can be extremely threatening to a woman.

> [B]ecause women are disproportionately the victims of rape and sexual assault, women have a stronger incentive to be concerned with sexual behavior. Women who are the victims of [even] mild forms of sexual harassment may understandably worry whether a harasser's conduct is merely a prelude to violent sexual assault.

Ellison v. Brady, 924 F.2d 872, 879 (9th

Cir.1991). In this way, sexual harassment may ultimately carry with it an inherent threat of physical confrontation. Bowman testified that Heller's pornographic photocopies did indeed make her feel vulnerable and afraid. They represented a violation of both her personal and bodily integrity by associating both her name and her face with sexually explicit images. By creating and distributing the photocopies of Bowman, Heller violated Bowman's right to be free from sexual harassment. Furthermore, such creation and distribution of the photocopies was threatening and intimidating within the meaning of M.G.L. c. 12 §§ 11H and 11I.[6]

[6]It is no defense to Bowman's claim under the MCRA that Heller did not intend to interfere with her civil rights or did not realize that his conduct would be viewed as sexual harassment. The Supreme Judicial Court has interpreted the MCRA as imposing "no express or implied requirement that an actor specifically intended to deprive a person of a secured right in order to be liable under the statute." Redgrave v. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., 399 Mass. 93, 99 (1987). See also, O'Connell

In addition to interfering with her right to be free from sexual harassment, Bowman alleges that Heller attempted to interfere with her right to run for union office by the same conduct, also in violation of the MCRA. Bowman's right to run for union office is secured by the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act, 29 U.S.C. § 481(e), Article I, Parts 1 and 9 of the Massachusetts Constitution, and M.G.L. c. 150E. Because the MCRA imposes liability for attempts as well as for actual interference, there need not be a finding that the distribution of the photocopies did in fact interfere with Bowman's campaign. Thus the fact that Bowman was able to continue with the campaign until the end does not bar her second MCRA claim.

Heller's conduct regarding the photocopies

v. Chasdi, 400 Mass. 686, 694 (1987).

amounted to an attempt to interfere with Bowman's right to run for union office. Heller specifically took Bowman's head and name from her campaign post card in order to create the pornographic photocopies of her. He distributed the photocopies at work to various co-employees, including Bowman's own campaign treasurer, while active campaigning for the Union presidency was still on-going. As previously established, Heller knew or should have known that given the inflammatory nature of the photocopies and the office practice of circulating various "satirical" materials, Bowman was not only substantially certain to see them, but would be greatly upset by them. Although Bowman chose for strategic reasons not to view the photocopies until active campaigning was over, had she seen them sooner, her reaction to them might very well have interfered with her campaign.

That Heller utilized pornographic images of Bowman in his attempt to interfere with her political rights was inherently intimidating. It is beyond doubt that a reasonable woman (or in the alternative a reasonable person) contemplating a candidacy such as Bowman's would, at the very least, hesitate to undertake it or to continue if the price exacted is gender-based humiliation in the workplace to the degree which Bowman ultimately experienced.

I turn now to Heller's counterclaims against Bowman for defamation. Count I involves the "Charges Against David Heller" (the "Charges") which Arthur Casey filed with the Union Trial Board on Bowman's behalf. Heller claims that by photocopying the Charges onto Union stationery and then posting them in the Worcester Welfare Office, Bowman "published" statements which were false or from which false and harmful inferences could be drawn. Specifically, Heller argues that the Charges on Union stationary implied that the Union as a body was taking action against him, rather than a fellow Union member. With respect to Count II, Heller claims that Bowman's reference to the photocopies incident as a "sexual assault" in a memorandum ("Sicktime Memo") to her supervisor and various other Office and Union personnel falsely accused him of criminal behavior.

In order to prevail on his counterclaims, Heller must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that (1) the statements of and concerning him were defamatory in character; (2) they were false; (3) they were published by Bowman; and (4) he suffered direct and proximate damages as a result. New England Tractor Trailer Training of Connecticut, Inc. v.

Globe Newspaper Co., 395 Mass. 471 (1985). The law in Massachusetts is that a publication is defamatory if it holds the plaintiff up to contempt, hatred, scorn, or ridicule or tends to impair his standing in the minds of a considerable and respectable class of the community. Brauer v. Globe Newspaper Co., 351 Mass. 53 (1966); Grande & Son, Inc. v. Chace, 333 Mass. 166 (1955); Tartaglia v. Townsend, 19 Mass.App.Ct. 693 (1985). With respect to statements of opinion,

> [a] defamatory communication may consist of a statement in the form of an opinion, but a statement of this nature is actionable only if it implies the allegation of undisclosed defamatory facts as the basis of the opinion.

Lyons v. Globe Newspaper Co., 415 Mass. 258, 258 (1993), citing National Ass'n of Gov't Employees, Inc. v. Central Broadcasting Corp., 379 Mass. 220, 227 (1979).

Bowman first argues that her statements regarding Heller are not actionable because she had a conditional privilege to publish them. As a Union officer, Bowman claims she had a right to post complying materials pertaining to Union affairs on the Union bulletin board. With regard to the Sicktime Memo, Bowman states she had a legitimate interest in notifying her supervisor and various management or recordkeeping personnel of time she needed off for therapy as a result of the photocopies incident. Bowman defends copies of the Memo which she gave to the Union stewards in her office as a necessary precaution in the event one of them had to represent her in any dispute with management regarding her time off. Bowman cites as authority Humphrey v. National Semiconductor Corp., 18 Mass.App.Ct. 132, 133-134 (1984), which states that a defamatory statement is conditionally privileged if it is published to those with whom the defendant had a legitimate reason for sharing it.

Bowman's second line of defense is that her statements regarding Heller were merely statements of opinion. Aside from identifying Heller as the perpetrator of the photocopies (admitted as true by Heller), Bowman argues that the other statements contained in the Charges only express an opinion about the nature of Heller's conduct. Bowman additionally argues that her characterization of the photocopies incident as a "sexual assault" was clearly an expression of opinion if taken in context with the rest of the Sicktime Memo. The second half of the Memo referred specifically to the Department's sexual harassment policy, for example.

Whether or not Bowman had a conditional privilege to publish the documents in question and whether or not Bowman's statements constituted non-actionable expressions of opinion, Heller's counterclaims ultimately fail because he has not proved Bowman's statements actually defamed him. Heller was unable to present more than his own speculation as to how the statements contained in the Charges and the Sicktime memo damaged his reputation or held him up to ridicule and contempt. On the contrary, Heller acknowledged during cross-examination that the reason some of his co-workers, two individuals in particular, stopped talking to him for a period of time may have been because he had created and distributed the obscene photocopies in the first place. See Trial Transcript, Vol. 7 at 17. Furthermore, even if actionable, Heller's counterclaims are not compensable because he has presented insufficient evidence on the issue of damages. He did not offer any corroborating testimony or produce any evidence causally linking his injuries to the posting of the Charges and/or the circulation of the Sicktime Memo, as opposed to, for example, the Department's investigation of his misconduct. Heller's own vague testimony about his injuries, including emotional distress, merely revealed that he did not seek any type of therapy or medical treatment for his symptoms. For the foregoing reasons, I find against the defendant on his counterclaims and they will be dismissed.

Lastly, the plaintiff urges that I award damages to her in a total amount of one hundred sixty thousand dollars ($160,000.00), fifty thousand dollars ($50,000.00) for intentional infliction of emotional distress, fifty thousand dollars ($50,000.00) for reckless infliction, fifty thousand dollars ($50,000.00) for sexual harassment, and ten thousand dollars ($10,000.00) for violating her right to seek Union office.

The plaintiff's approach to the issue of damages is fragmented or duplicative; and I disagree with it. To be sure, the defendant's vile deed violated several rights of the plaintiff. But the misconduct itself was a discrete event, although the defendant certainly compounded it by his subsequent negative stance. And although the plaintiff was injured in more ways than one, i.e., attempted interference with her campaign as well as emotional distress, the several adverse effects resulted from the defendant's one outrageous attack. Therefore, while the plaintiff is entitled to be fairly compensated for the pain and suffering inflicted by the defendant, Haddad v. Gonzalez, 410 Mass.

855, 870-871 (1991), and for the reasonable cost of her therapeutic expenses resulting from his attack,[7] subdividing her losses and correlating them with her claims for relief is uncalled for.

I conclude that a total damages award of thirty-five thousand dollars ($35,000.00) will fairly and adequately compensate the plaintiff for her injuries. In keeping with my view of the unitary nature of the harm inflicted here, I also rule that any one of the plaintiff's claims (c. 12, § 11I, c. 214, § 1C, and intentional infliction of emotional distress) is a sufficient basis for the foregoing award.

The plaintiff also seeks costs and reasonable attorneys' fees, and she is entitled to them. M.G.L. c. 12, § 11I. The plaintiff may file an appropriate motion, with supporting materials, on or before July 30, 1993, and the defendant may file responsively on or before August 20, 1993. Either party may request a hearing on the motion.

So Ordered.

It's Tonya?

TOKYO — It might not have the prestige of an office from Disney or Revlon. But one Japanese businessman says Tonya Harding has just the image he's looking for.

Tonya was made to be a pro wrestler. Take it Mitsunaga, chairman of the hugely popular sport's All Japan Women's Professional Wrestling Association, said yesterday. "She's about as tough as they come, and she'll last a lot longer in our sport than she will in figure skating."

Mitsunaga says he's willing to pay Harding $3 million to get into the ring. "If that's what Disney's paying Nancy Kerrigan, that's what we'll pay Tonya," even if I have to go into debt to do it," he said.

A representative of the wrestling association has been sent to Oregon to make Harding an offer. Mitsunaga said he hopes to meet Harding while she is in Japan for the World Figure Skating Championships, which begin next Tokyo next week.

BITS and PIECES

ASSHOLE OF THE MONTH

ALAN M. DERSHOWITZ

He can paint flapjack on his sphincters and whistle "Hava Nagila" through his rectum, but an Asshole is still an Asshole. Alan M. Dershowitz, headline-chasing Harvard Law professor and HUSTLER's Asshole of the Month for February 1992, is a shit ring in lifesaver's disguise.

"I believe in free speech for everybody without exception," orates Dershowitz. At his $400-an-hour fees, free speech is not cheap. The Yale Law School alumnus smugly accepts being labeled "the lawyer of last resort," boasting that he will often "hear from people who have nowhere else to turn."

Yet Dersh, who pulls down $100,000-plus yearly from Harvard, also hears from people who have ywhere else to turn. Rich-guy .der suspect Claus von Bulow, tax-cheating hotel mogul Leona Helmsley, swindling evangelist Jim Bakker, junk-bond felon Michael Milken—all have bought assistance from Dershowitz.

Dershowitz says he chooses only those clients who offer him the chance to right a grievous wrong or uphold a hallowed principle of democracy. His docket of democracy-saving defenses includes such wrongs-to-be-righted as money laundering and cocaine distribution, conspiracy to smuggle 18 tons of hashish, a scheme by a personal-injury lawyer to submit fraudulent medical bills to insurance companies, a conspiracy by organized-crime figures to extort money from vending-machine companies, a racketeering conspiracy involving loan sharking, conspiracy to murder a government witness, and an organized-crime effort to infiltrate the New York waterfront.

Dershowitz would have the world believe that he is idealistically superior to the slick-tongued dope lawyers and Mob mouthpieces who ensure that crime for profit remains an American blight. Turn on Donahue, Geraldo, Merv Griffin, David Letterman, Morton Downey Jr.—there's Prof. Dersh hawking his brilliant ass in the seamy spotlight, posing as a higher moral authority.

The myth of Dershowitz as liberal superhero is furthered in Reversal of Fortune, a 1990 movie made from a book written by Dershowitz. A subplot of the film depicts the lawyer's rabid concern for the fictional "Johnson brothers," two young blacks on Alabama's Death Row who helped their dad escape from prison and are unjustly being punished for a murder the father later committed.

In real life, minus factual manipulation, Dershowitz represented the Tison brothers. Subsequently locked up in Arizona, the Tisons busted out their killer pop and a murderer buddy, armed both with guns and stood by as the cons wasted a family of four while procuring a getaway car. One more discrepancy: The Tisons are white; a less-than-ideal hue to a moral crusader.

"The major criterion for me taking a case," crows the defender, "is, 'Have I gotten pissed off at something or somebody?' " The plight of rich people in trouble seems to truly anger Dershowitz. Enlisted to assist in reducing Wall Street mega-cheat Michael Milken's ten-year sentence, Dershowitz's most voluble argument so far is that Milken is the victim of an anti-Semitic smear campaign.

But then Dershowitz, who portrays himself as a member of an oppressed minority, sees anti-Semitism everywhere, asserting that American Jews are treated as second-class citizens in a country where they enjoy wealth and political influence out of proportion to their share of the population. "Every time I attend a gathering of Jewish children," writes Dersh in his chauvinistic screed Chutzpah, "I imagine SS guards lining up these children for the gas chambers." Which is one more thing the little lawyer has in common with Adolf Hitler. Like Der Fuehrer, Dersh is driven by ethnic zealotry, bristles under criticism and puts forth the notion of a special, privileged race.

On most days, Dershowitz is slightly more popular with American Jews than is Adolf. Henry Siegman, executive director of the American Jewish Congress, characterizes the prof as an "unscrupulous and self-serving" liar.

Last year Dershowitz insisted that admitted felon Milken must serve real jail time. Now that he's on the junk-bond gravy train, Dersh maintains the czar should be freed. He's changed the tune he whistles, but the Asshole still stinks.
